ResearchGate

See discussions, stats, and author profiles for this publication at: https://www.researchgate.net/publication/305347360

‘Dream Films,’ Women's Time & Sleep

Chapter · June 2015

CITATIONS
0

READS
190

1 author:

Karen Heald
Bangor University
11 PUBLICATIONS 17 CITATIONS

SEE PROFILE

All content following this page was uploaded by Karen Heald on 15 July 2016.

The user has requested enhancement of the downloaded file.

CHAPTER NINE

'DREAM FILMS,' WOMEN'S TIME AND SLEEP

KAREN HEALD

The Chora

The Chora sets the context for a "psychic space" relating to the condition and existential situation that I am researching from an artistic perspective. It begins from my encounter with Kristeva's terms "semiotic chora"[1] and "women's time"[2] alongside my original concept of "transitory strata."[3] In relating the terms semiotic and chora, Kristeva argues that the chora is the space in which the meaning that is produced is semiotic, such as: the sounds of an infant's cooing; the psychotic's inability to communicate language in a meaningful way; or the artist who mobilizes the semiotic for creative and novel means. These meanings are significant and are expanded on in "transitory strata," a term which describes preverbal, personal spaces, that draw from Kristeva's "semiotic chora" and through the making of experimental "dream films," visualize a re-interpretation of sleep, the unconscious and experiential time. The "dream films" are key elements and through analogies and cross-readings between theory and practice, I have artistically and collaboratively worked through this research. The chora has enabled me to explore and expand on preverbal spaces by the use of subtle suggestions within the films. I have used this approach as a method for creating artworks and using video as a creative tool. The discourses and implications around the chora have assisted me in articulating what I am seeking in the artworks/practice. In addition to "transitory strata" I discuss two further key terms of mine – "being in-between" and "in-between-ness." The first is a space that oscillates between the personal preverbal "transitory strata" and the public places of "in-between-ness." The latter is a conceptual, reflective public space offering a synthesis of collaborative arts and science practice.

Although Kristeva has written on numerous academic subjects, in this research I explore Kristeva's texts with an emphasis on cyclical, maternal and monumental time. For this, I draw on my notion of time as being a time and space of "being in-between" different levels of consciousness and of being in simultaneous worlds. I attempt to create the paradoxical – the "unrepresentable" or the "unspeakable" which is addressed in the "unconscious thetic" while

---

[1] Julia Kristeva's notion of the "semiotic chora" and time, in relation to linguistics and feminist critical theory, acts as a model for this research. In the first place, the terms semiotic and chora frequently remind us that the chora is the space in which the meaning that is produced is semiotic. Kristeva uses maternal language when discussing the chora, speaking of its motility and comparing it to contractions and the maternal part of giving birth and the birth itself. She describes the "'energy' charges as well as 'psychical' marks, [which] articulate what we call a chora: a non-expressive totality formed by the drives and their stases in a motility that is as full of movement as it is regulated and cannot be represented." Julia Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language (New York: Columbia University Press, 1974/1984).

[2] In "Women's Time", Kristeva discusses women's link with cyclical and monumental time as a conceptualising of time from the context of reproduction and motherhood, and the need for a future generation of feminists to confront the task of reconciling maternal time (motherhood), with linear (political and historical) time - readily labelled masculine. Julia Kristeva, "Women's Time" in New Maladies of the Soul (New York: Columbia University Press, 1979).

[3] "''Transitory strata'' are preverbal, personal spaces which draw from Kristeva's semiotic "chora" and, through the making of experimental "dream films", visualize a re-interpretation of sleep, the unconscious and experiential time. This differs from the split or the divided self as it pertains to fleeting parallels of time that exist within the creatives' or the depressives' state of being. This ephemerality is discovered within the individual, lying amidst the layers of consciousness, the realms of waking, reverie and wakefulness. These experiences seldom occur whilst asleep, but can be stirred by direct sensitivity to sounds, which when heightened under extreme moments of creativity, stress or illness, can take a person on a more profound pathway. These journeys, or "transitory strata", have the ability to build and fragment, and the "dream films" aim to echo, the unarticulated and the unutterable." Karen Heald, '"'Dream Films" and Research as Collaborative Practice in Contemporary Art and Science Methodologies" (PhD thesis, Leeds: Leeds Metropolitan University, 2014).

opening up for a re-presentation of temporal experiences. The "unconscious thetic" refers to the raw primitiveness of the mind's sensations to create a fluid sense of the self and environment offering an innate and intrinsic act. This attempt to offer another translation of time is achieved through "dream films" where time is proposed as a mechanism in which to devise significant artistic methodologies on the "in-between-ness" of film and research as collaborative practice. By using the camera and editing in this unique way my aspiration for the viewer is that they will experience the "dream films" through multiple layers. It is a paradoxical undertaking to give voice to the unutterable, or perhaps rather to allow it to disperse more widely with a sense of authority and agency. Therefore, my intention for the "unconscious thetic" in relation to editing and the viewer's situation is extremely important.

Kristeva describes two temporal splits in her theory of time - the time of linear history and monumental time – where she links cyclical and monumental time with female subjectivity. She asks for a need for future generations of feminists to confront the task of reconciling maternal (motherhood) and linear (political and historical) time.[4] I am especially interested in this motility and the spontaneous movement between the semiotic and the symbolic, recognising that the chora is not just a space, such as the womb, or receptacle but one that precedes language. Plato, from whom Kristeva borrowed the term chora relates it to a cosmic motion.[5] I, however, became increasingly drawn to Kristeva's concept of the chora and the "psychic" environment of the infant towards the mother's body. Distinct from Kristeva's work which focuses on people with borderline personality disorders, my explorations synthesizes the chora and its ambiguities between time and film within contemporary art practice. I am interested in this 'third space" and it is in the "transitory strata," through the language of fine art, specifically "dream films," where the preverbal personal space of the creatives' or depressives' state of being can encounter momentary parallels of time that are less "beyond us" than "in-between."

As such, non-linear narratives are prevalent in my "dream films," where I explore temporal modes and engage with other female directors working with cinematic time. I explore their relationships with the sense of the passage of time. I seek the experiential quality of the duration of time and the didactic between past and future. Jane Campion's The Piano (1993)[6] Stephen Daldry's The Hours (2003)[7] and various literary and film critiques are studied in relation to Kristeva's chora. I was intrigued by how the tensions between the semiotic and symbolic language in The Piano was heightened through music, a path that Kristeva took by introducing music therapy in her psychoanalytical practice. Trinh T Minh-ha, in the film The Fourth Dimension (2001)[8] explored 'tenseless' time in a wonderfully poetic portrayal of contemporary Japan, depicting the image as 'time light.' Minh-ha connects between self and other, human and machine, viewer and image, real and fiction, exploring the connection where past and present could occur. Her films venture into a world of "in-between" realities; into and out of the space of "awakened dreams." This rhapsody of "beyond words and beyond time" could also encompass The Hours, relating it to Virginia Woolf's novel Mrs Dalloway (1926).[9]

Whereas Kristeva focused on the materiality of language, its sounds and rhythms rather than its communicative element, I focused on the materiality of film via colours, audio/visual properties

---

[4] Julia Kristeva, "Women's Time", in New Maladies of the Soul. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1979/1984).

[5] Kristeva extracts the term semiotic chora from the Greek philosopher Plato's text Chora Plato, Timaeus and Critias, trans. Desmond Lee and Thomas Kjeller Johansen (London: Penguin Classics, 2008). Plato expresses his theories on how the universe was created, describing the chora as a space, meaning both a receptacle and nurse, that is, the container and the producer, of what the universe is before anything else exists.

[6] The Piano, directed by Jane Campion (1993; Australia: Cibey 2000 Home Entertainment, 1997), DVD.

[7] The Hours, directed by Stephen Daldry (United States: Paramount Pictures and Miramax Films Home Entertainment, 2003), DVD.

[8] The Fourth Dimension, directed by Trinh T. Minh-ha & Jean-Paul Bourdier (Japan: Women Make Movies Home Entertainment, 2001), DVD.

[9] Virginia Woolf, Mrs Dalloway (London: Penguin Classics, 1926).

and its visceral qualities. Sound, colour, the triptych and editing have, therefore, all added to the artistic emanation of the chora effect. For example, pra II, (Karen Heald, 2005)[10] explored the relationship between video and painting pictorially within a framed composition and evolved into a dream-like quality through a "small" drama, with the tension heightened from sound by collaborator Susan Matthews. As such, it differed from the mainstream formats of commercial and documentary films (Fig. 1-1).

Fig. 1-1: Heald, K. (2005) pra II [film still]. Testbed 3, Leeds Metropolitan University, Gallery, Leeds, UK.

Another space and time compounded by colour was explored in the film Paper Interior (Heald & Susan Liggett, 2013)[11] which had a connection with Johannes Vermeer's use of interiors and lighting (Fig. 1-2), whilst The Artists' Creation (Heald & Liggett, 2009)[12] was a "painterly reverie" that communicated difficult social issues with subtle visual stanzas (Fig. 1-3).

Fig. 1-2: Heald, K. & Liggett, S. (2013) Paper Interior [filmed performance / installation]. Wrexham, Wales.

[10] pra II, directed by Karen Heald (Czech Republic/UK: Karen Heald , 2005), Video: SD.
[11] Paper Interior, directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett (Wales: Karen Heald, 2013), Video: HD.
[12] The Artists' Creation, directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett (Wales: Karen Heald, 2009), Video: HD.

Fig. 1-3: Heald, K. & Liggett, S. (2009) The Artists' Creation, [filmed performance]. Wrexham, Wales.

I examined the triptych - the fundamental language for the illiterate within religious iconography - and created two different film triptychs. The first one was Drifting on a Pink Cloud (Heald & Rachael Kearney, 2007)[13] which made the audience question where to look. However, this initial work did not hold a rational logic with only time as duration acting as a unifying source (Fig. 1-4).

Fig. 1-4: Heald, K. & Kearney, R. (2007) Drifting on a Pink Cloud [photographs from video performance], Kanazawa, Japan.

In contrast, the second film, White (Heald & Liggett, 2013)[14] had an aesthetic balance of contrast and harmony and explored time and the politics of location. In White the triptych acts as a visual discourse and relates three main temporal linear distinctions of the past, the present and the future. The film is layered rather than positioned side by side; there is an inner core of listening, ruminating from the haunting lyrics by Hannah Atkins. The film appears as a mise-en-scene with the pace slowed down and repetition creating a form of reverie (Fig. 1-5).

[13] Drifting on a Pink Cloud, directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney (Japan: Karen Heald, 2007), Video: SD.
[14] White, directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett (Wales: Karen Heald, 2013), Video: HD.

Fig. 1-5: Heald, K. & Liggett, S. (2009) White [film still]. Wrexham, Wales.

The collaborative work with the dancer and choreographer, Caroline Sabin is cited as an example of the tactile and kinaesthetic relationship to the Kristevan chora through the use of the camera and editing techniques. In Not still at home: poise (Heald & Caroline Sabin, 2010)[15] Sabin, who is used to choreographing for hours, days or even months before shooting, was filmed spontaneously and impromptu using a fixed focus lens, long take, for 10 minutes. The footage was framed low to the ground and restrictive, which created a performance task for Sabin as a mover. Here I attempted to escape the conventional visual language (Fig. 1-6).

Fig.1-6: Heald, K. & Sabin, C. (2010) Not still at home: poise [video performance]. Cardiff, Wales.

[15] Not still at home: poise, directed by Karen Heald & Caroline Sabin (Wales: Karen Heald, 2010), Video: HD.

Similar to Maya Deren's film A Study in Choreography for the Camera (1945)[16] where she uses symbolism in unconventional ways by the method of cutting up images; I rethink how we see things through the camera lens. Deren's film celebrates the principles of the power of movement through extensive editing. In Not still at home: equilibrium (Heald & Sabin, 2010)[17] the cameras act as the editors through their orchestrated placement, and open LCD screens, creating a montage which was synchronized in the mirror (Fig.1-7). The relationship between both films is that they could only exist as films with the dancers moving in time and space. Along the same lines, Adrienne Rich (1984) discusses the need not to transcend but to reclaim women's bodies.[18] I relate this to Sabin's tactile space and the relationship between her home and herself, speaking of the slippage between transcendence and reclamation.

Fig. 1-7: Heald, K. & Sabin, C. (2010) Not still at home: equilibrium [video performance]. Cardiff, Wales.

Historically, feminist avant-garde filmmakers have most consistently engaged with time and the unconscious by incorporating psychoanalytic readings of women and their dreams. Early choreographed examples are Deren's Meshes of the Afternoon (1943)[19] and Ritual in Transfigured Time (1946)[20] which subverted Freudian symbols and sourced Greek mythology to readdress female subjectivity and the human psyche. Through the creation of new images and complex

[16] A Study in Choreography for the Camera, directed by Maya Deren (1945; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre), Film: 16mm.
[17] Not still at home: equilibrium, directed by Karen Heald & Caroline Sabin (Wales: Karen Heald, 2010), Video: HD.
[18] Adrienne Rich, Notes Towards a Politics of Location in Blood, Bread and Poetry: Selected Prose 1979-85 (New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1984), 210-231.
[19] Meshes of the Afternoon, directed by Maya Deren & Alexander Hamid (1943; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre), Film: 16mm.
[20] Ritual in Transfigured Time, directed by Maya Deren (1946; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre), Film:16mm.

editing techniques Alison Butler (2007)[21] notes that Deren's films poetically point to scientific and technological changes having consequences throughout culture. This is evident in the more recent psychological film Black Swan (Darron Aronofsky, 2010)[22] which depicts a study of a female breakdown unfolding on the screen. The significance of the maternal and the pre-Oedipal in the psychological make-up of subjectivity has been an area that Kristeva has repeatedly returned to, being interested in the very early infancy stage. Here she embraces Melanie Klein's notion of the maternal[23] which precedes Sigmund Freud's Oedipal complex[24] and Jacques Lacan's mirror stage.[25] Kristeva emphasizes that the maternal function and its importance in the evolution of subjectivity gives access to culture and language. Researching psychoanalytical theories and Kristeva's concepts, Laura Mulvey wrote her influential essay Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema (1975) which evolved feminist theory.[26]

Kristeva discusses Charlotte Perkins Gilman's novel The Yellow Wallpaper (1892), which was a response to her neurasthesia - equated today as postnatal depression - as a new feminism.[27] It inspired Patricia MacKinnon-Day's work Enclosure for Naked Spaces (2001)[28] and gave Perkin Gilman's work a visual narrative, exploring the role of the women within the institution and Kristeva's theory of intertextuality. Writing from a psychoanalytical, literary and philosophical perspective, Miglena Nikolchina, in Matricide in Language (2004), focused on Kristeva's intertextuality when exploring the connections between Virgina Woolf and Kristeva.[29]

The association between poetic images and text has become more prevalent in my artistic practice. Through the visual language that develops from a background of ambiguity within the films, this non-verbal communication translates through the performative use of time-based media. The films and photographic installations endeavour to create unique lyrical dialects of an evolving painterly and sculptural video language through the incorporation of found objects, which are imbued with multiple meanings. The films have tended to have a fixed focus tableau style framing with minimal lighting and effects – preferably daylight. This process also enables a quiet reflective time to think with a multitude of film footage taken (approximately 2-3 hours per session) proceeded by the editing of the films down to approximately 3-10 minutes. From a meditative synthesis of time, slot length, and layering, the interplay of edits and cuts are the grammatical

---

[21] Alison Butler "Motor-driven metaphysics: movement, time and action in the films of Maya Deren," Screen 48 (2007): 1-23.

[22] Black Swan, directed by Darren Aronofsky (2010; United States: Fox Searchlight Pictures Home Entertainment, 2011), DVD.

[23] Melanie Klein studied Freud's writings and developed her own work on childhood theory. Richard. L. Gregory The Oxford Companion To The Mind (USA: Oxford University Press, 1987).

[24] Sigmund Freud based his theory on the myth of Oedipal Rex, as told by Sophocles in his Theban Plays commencing where Oedipal awakens to his patricide and the unconscious incest with his mother. Anne Baring & Jules Cashford The Myth of the Goddess (London: Penguin Books, 1993).

[25] Jacques Lacan, the French psychoanalyst, defines the mirror stage as the moment when a child, seeing [sic] one in a mirror, is enabled to a unitary body image. The screen (ecran) between the subject and the real is part of a specular structure that constitutes the subject. Maggie Humm The Dictionary of Feminist Theory (Prentice Hall/ Harvester Wheatsheaf: Hemel Hempstead, 1995), 173.

[26] Laura Mulvey's article was influenced by the theories of Freud and Lacan, and was one of the first major essays that helped shift the orientation of film theory towards a psychoanalytic framework. Laura Mulvey "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema," Screen 16 (1975): 6-18. Prior to Mulvey, film theorists such as Jean-Louis Baudry and Christian Metz incorporated psychoanalytical concepts in their theoretical accounts of the cinema. Mulvey's contribution, however, inaugurated the intersection of film theory, psychoanalysis and feminism. Christian Metz, The Imaginary Signifier: Psychoanalysis and the Cinema (Indiana: Indiana University Press, 1982).

[27] The Yellow Wallpaper was a 6,000-word short story, first published in January, 1892 in The New England Magazine, America. It is regarded as an important early work of American feminist literature, illustrating attitudes in the 19th century toward women's physical and mental health. Kristeva defines Charlotte Gilman Perkin's text as the new feminism, describing it as a language which not only contested the patriarchal order but also the male as being dual voiced in the sense of retaining the wife's role as subordinate, and also renouncing her ability to recognise her own needs, thereby retaining ultimate control. The dialogue confronted language and in doing so produced its own discourse through its intertextuality. Julia Kristeva, Desire in Language: A Semiotic Approach to Literature and Art (New York: Columbia University Press, 1980).

[28] Patricia MacKinnon-Day, Enclosure, Naked Spaces, installation, 2001, Oriel Davies Gallery, Newtown, Powys, Wales.

[29] Miglena Nikolchina focused on the intertextual reading of Virginia Woolf and Julia Kristeva in order to address the mystery of the persistent suppression of women's contributions to culture. Nikolchina invited the reader to rethink "the controversial place of the maternal in relation to the symbolic, and [showed] how the maternal emerges within writing as a kind of stammering in search of self-expression." Miglena Nikolchina, Matricide in Language: Writing Theory in Kristeva and Woolf (New York: Other Press, 2004), 152.

structuring of the work. The visual architecture upon which the images hang is like the phrasing, meter, rhyming of words in a poem. The titles of the films allow stories to interplay and give the viewer access to the artworks, relating to Kristeva's notion of intertextuality and transportation[30] within the format of a short experimental film.

Through the "dream films" I am developing an intuitive way to think through the lens, not just filming randomly but exploring colour, line and form to develop an intensity of digging deeper – unravelling a sense of time, reverie or unknown reality. As an experimental filmmaker I endeavour to portray this journey, attempting to reveal and allude to the invisibility of time. The artworks cited emphasize not only the films' poetics but also reveal the scientific techniques of the camera. Achieved by the absence of linear narratives and sound tracks – by sourcing sound site-specifically and varying the speed by slow motion – such as in the "dream film" Diapason (Heald, 2013).[31] The film is, therefore, a tool that can be applied to time as the telescope and microscope are applied to space (Fig.1-8).

Fig. 1-8: Heald, K. (2013) Diapason [film stills]. Ellesmere, UK.

In the sciences, film has proved revolutionary as a way of amalgamating a variety of temporal phenomena and to record objective reality. Slowing down film also brings about its poetics, evoking dreams and entering into the submerged world of the unconscious. By engaging with the Kristevian chora the notion of the spoken word, being dissociable yet concentric, has been explored. The artworks became intentionally framed to display and narrate the unconscious recordings and measurements of time, the gap between waking and sleep.

Dreams & Sleep

There is a growing exchange between art and science practitioners and theorists and I have contributed to the dialogues created by previous artists and academics focusing on sleep, time and the politics of location. I have collaborated with artists, sociologists and scientists in Europe and Asia to synthesise women's sleep with time and the chora from an arts and science perspective. This has involved employing different approaches, which have varied from empirical and quantifiable scientific testing and analytical processes to qualitative perception, intuition and myth. I have facilitated access to the imaginative dream world, through the creation of "staged" sleep performances in diverse sites and over several phases, which concentrated on female corporeality.

Collaborating with Dr Myriam Kerkoffs, Director of Sleep Research in Belguim on the piece Drift (Heald, 2004-2005)[32] I attempted to analyse time and the unconscious through dialogues with the science specialists by using video equipment common to both disciplines, yet re-initialised by [30] Kristeva's earliest characterizations of intertextuality (for example, "in the space of a text several utterances, taken from other texts, intersect and neutralize each other") associate it with the process of literary allusion. In Revolution in Poetic Language, however, a much stronger accent falls on the dynamics of transposition (that is, the unstable process whereby differently realized texts collide in, say, a novel) and Kristeva goes out of her way to disassociate intertextuality from the "study of sources." Because intertextuality is identified in Revolution in Poetic Language as a third primary process (primary processes were Freud's list of psychic activities that effect the form and content of dreams), it is equally clear that transposition is designed to give the analyst access to the permutation of subject positions undergone in the production of a work. Science.jrank.org, "Text/Textuality - Julia Kristeva: Textual Productivity And Intertextuality" accesed June 30, 2014, http://science.jrank.org/pages/11415/Text-Textuality-Julia-Kristeva-Textual-Productivity-Intertextuality.html.

[31] Diapason, directed by Karen Heald (UK: Karen Heald, 2013), Video: HD.

[32] Drift, directed by Karen Heald (Belgium: Karen Heald, 2004-2005), Video: SD.

the collaborative arts practice-based investigations and interpretations. My methodology differed in the sense that my research interests were aimed at capturing both an interior and exterior experience of sleep and time, encapsulating not only the dream space but also the social context and the relationship of the body to the site. I explored the notion of transcendence through the "dream films," the social context and psychology of sleep, and considered the very intimate space of sleep and how this could be sensitively addressed through my gaze as a filmmaker (Fig. 2-1).

Fig 2-1: Heald, K. (2004-2005) Drift III [video installation]. Charleroi University Hospital, Belgium.

The ensuing films and images from the exhibitions could be experienced as being extremely personal and yet astonishingly familiar, symptomatic of the shared dream world found in Jung's collective unconscious. Time, as experienced in the chora precedes Kristeva's thetic[33] phase where the subject is on the threshold of emergence into symbolic language. As such, through the visual and emotional language of "dream films," the "unconscious thetic" latently reveals itself to an enquiring viewer. On completion of Drift I was conversant with contemporary artists' and scientists' working in a similar field, such as Catherine Yass and Dr Mary Morrell. I wanted to further investigate the notion of transcendence and the feasibility of encapsulating interior and exterior experiences through the "dream films." Advanced knowledge of the context and psychology of sleep came upon collaborating with sociologist Dr Jenny Hislop and glass artist Chris Bird-Jones on a pilot study resulting in jointly authored papers and exhibitions. Sleep and the female gaze were important issues within the experimental "dream films" in the investigation. Due to often being on both sides of the camera as director and performer I also became the observer and the observed. The interaction with concepts from film theorists and makers, such as Laura Mulvey with her notion of the "Pensive Spectator" (2006)[34] and Zeinabu Irene Davis' who as, bell hooks, describes is creating an "oppositional gaze" (1992)[35] has enabled me to [33] Kristeva uses the concept of chora to describe the continuous rhythmic and feminine space shared by mother and child prior to the emergence of what she calls the thetic phase that prepares the sign for emergence into the symbolic order. Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language (New York: Columbia University Press, 1974/1984).

[34] Through the 'dream films' I began to expand upon the notion of the female gaze within the still and moving image as commented upon by Mulvey in Death 24x a Second: Stillness and the Moving Image (2006). Extending upon her arguments from her landmark text Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema (1975), Mulvey discusses the different types of spectators. Drawing from the work of Raymond Bellour, Mulvey theorises on the 'Possessive Spectator' who is a possessive, "fetishistic" spectator of the new cinema of delay (video). This spectator draws pleasure from the ability to stop, control, repeat, and somehow possess stilled film images, particularly of movie stars. She then provides the idea of the gender neutral 'Pensive Spectator' for whom the cinema of delay prompts considerations about cinema itself and for whom fascination displaces fetishistic scopophilia as the main form of pleasure. Laura Mulvey, Death 24x a Second: Stillness and the Moving Image (London: Reaktion Books, 2006), 190-196.

[35] Writing from a black feminist perspective American author, bell hooks, put forth the notion of the "oppositional gaze," encouraging black women not to accept stereotypical representations in film, but rather actively critique them. bell hooks, Black Looks: Race and Representation (Boston: South End Press, 1992). Zeinabu Irene Davis, one of a growing number of independent black women filmmakers, has actively constructed this "oppositional gaze" that looks through and at African-American female experiences via a black lens. Davis' film Co-Motion: Tales of Breastfeeding Woman seeks to reclaim black female subjectivity contextualise the ethics involved in the transition from the camera to the editing suite and from subject to object. Cecily Brennan's film Melancholia (2005)[36] was instrumental in the multi-layered relationship not only with painters such as Hans Holbein and Albert Moore but also Kristeva's publication Black Sun (1989),[37] melancholia and the abject. As a female filmmaker and researcher, I attempted to distort the gaze and portray sensitive, non-vouyeristic depictions of women at sleep – a time when they are most vulnerable. Doing this required mutual trust and respect to enable a uniquely female visual language. In transcending verbal communication this paradoxically often involved direct observational scientific methodologies and becoming the researcher and the researched in complex collaborations.

Sleep also encounters the realm of the theatrical performance with the bed as the stage forming a dramaturgical analysis as discussed by Erving Goffman in The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (1956).[38] This related to the "transitory strata" and the transitional spaces between the conscious and the unconscious and it was at this point that I first introduced the diary format as a creative tool into the art practice. This was an attempt to record the opportunities and challenges that occurred from the interaction between the sociologist and the artist, the reversal of roles and the spaces that lay "in-between." This motility of space was played out theatrically in the use of the materials chosen with Bird-Jones in The Pillow Series. The association was drawn between various fairy tale characters from films and literary fields such as Sleeping Beauty (2008) to current artist performances, for example, Cornelia Parker and Tilda Swinton's The Maybe at the Museum of Modern Art in New York (2013).[39] However, that is where the resemblance ended, for the women displayed in the glass pillows were not trapped. By filming women and separating the dreamer from the viewer, The Pillow Series I & II (2006-2007)[40] investigated what it might mean through poetic (re)constructions of time, the body, and an exploration of spatial configurations. Co-Motion: Tales of Breastfeeding Woman, directed by Zeinabu Irene Davis (2010; United States, UCLA Film and Television Archive), Film: 16mm.

---

[36] Visiting Oriel Mostyn's (2011) exhibition Love Film, I experienced two films directed by Cecily Brennan, Melancholia (2005; Ireland: Cecily Brennan) and Unstrung (2007; Ireland: Cecily Brennan) which utilized the female body. Observing these films I immediately comprehended and connected to Brennan's more obvious symbols (trestles, black liquid etc.) through which she referenced Kristeva's Black Sun: Depression and Melancholia (New York: Columbia University Press, 1989), and the 'abject' from Kristeva's, Desire in Language: A Semiotic Approach to Literature and Art. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1980). Caoimhín Mac Giolla Léith describes this connection to the 'lethal flood' or 'oceanic death' articulated by Kristeva in her account of depression and melancholia as a "traumatic state [which] is, however, given palpable form in the physically inexplicable ooze symbolising black bile, an excess of which the ancients believed to be the cause of melancholia (from Ancient Greek melas, 'black', + kholé, 'bile)." Mac Giolla Léith also discusses Brennan's undeniable homage to Hans Holbein's The Body of Christ in the Tomb (1521) and states that "unlike Holbein's physically tortured dead Christ, stretched and supine in his ornately carved cask, the body of Brennan's living woman, is cramped and slightly contorted, wracked by a less palpable torment." Caoimhin Mac Giolla Léith, "Damage and Survival." in Cecily Brennan: Selected Works 1999-2007, ed. Cecily Brennan (Skibbereen: West Cork Arts Centre, 2007). This relates to Bram Dijkstra's article Idols of Perversity (1986) which critiques Albert Moore's painting Apples (1875). By depicting two sleeping women and stating that their bodies while in "the process of trying to find a comfortable position…[they were]…trapped in peculiar twists, which emphasized the extent of their languorous passivity ...". Bram Dijkstra, Idols of Perversity: Fantasies of Feminine Evil in Fin-de-Siècle Culture (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986). However in Brennan's Melancholia the woman has her eyes open, yet avoids the viewer's gaze as she frequently glances downwards towards the floor.

[37] Julia Kristeva. Black Sun: Depression and Melancholia trans. Leon. S. Roudiez (New York: Columbia University Press, 1989).

[38] The notion of sleep as a theatrical performance, with the bed being the stage, draws on Canadian sociologist and writer Erving Goffman's study of symbolic interaction in the form of dramaturgical analysis. Goffman framed the symbolic interaction as the theatrical performance that applies to face-to-face interactions, believing that when individuals come into contact with other people, they change their appearance or manner in an attempt to control or guide impressions others may perceive of them. Goffman claimed that privacy lies beneath all social interaction and that the dramaturgical approach functions to explain this mystery. I attempted to investigate this private place by exploring the transitional space between the conscious and unconscious, of "transitory strata," and the temporal boundaries of dormancy in the personal space of the bedroom. Erving Goffman, The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (New York: Doubleday, 1956).

[39] The artist, Cornelia Parker collaborated with actress Tilda Swinton in a performance/installation called The Maybe which portrayed Swinton lying fully clothed and apparently asleep, inside a vitrine. Swinton was put on display, but appeared trapped at the same time as the work questioned the role of celebrities in our society. Parker first exhibited The Maybe in the Serpentine Gallery, London in 1995 but more recently it was repositioned in the Museum of Modern Art (MOMA) in New York in 2013. Cornelia Parker & Tilda Swinton, The Maybe, performance/installation, 2013, Museum of Modern Art, New York, USA.

[40] The idea of making glass pillows to house filmed sleep performances become known as The Pillow Series. As a succession the artworks created for The Pillow Series I & II were exhibited in various formats at the Kunstraum Gallery in Germany one of four venues used. Chris Bird-Jones & Karen Heald The Pillow Series I & II, video installations, 2006-2007, Kunstraum Gallery, Lüneburg, Germany.

as women to be "staging" sleep performances, being simultaneously in other worlds and timelines. This evolved "transitory strata" by visualising a re-presentation of sleep, the unconscious and experiential time (Fig.2-2).

Fig. 2-2: Bird-Jones, C. & Heald, K. (2006-2007) The Pillow Series I & II [video installation & detail]. Kunstraum Gallery, Lüneburg, Germany.

The research project, The Dream Space,[41] was a natural extension of The Pillow Series, and enabled the investigation to evolve through "staging" sleep performances in Asia with international collaborators. In response to Kathleen Kirby (1993) and Adrienne Rich's notions of "locational politics" I questioned what sleep and the body meant cross-culturally and in different places through the art of "dream films." The significance of the relationship between the sleeper and the site became paramount. Travelling from Beijing to Ulaanbaatar on the Trans-Mongolian Railway, I visualised the train as a space between "here, there and nowhere." Recording a "staged" sleep performance in a carriage with Beth Turnbull, a newly acquainted passenger, involved immense trust, as feelings of vulnerability and intimacy are present when people are sleeping. In talking with Beth, our initial conversations included dialogues around RoseLee Goldberg's publication Performance Art: From Futurism to the Present (1988)[42] that discussed the place of performance in art history, which started in tribal rituals, medieval passion plays and Renaissance spectacles. For the sleep performance Beth (Heald & Beth Turnbull, 2007)[43] similar to other women that I have filmed, Beth was clothed in her own garments and did not expose her body. The ensuing "dream films" were an attempt to offer observational non-voyeuristic experiences for the viewer/reader (Fig 2-3). By filming one-to-one with my collaborators, the artworks were created in personal rooms or spaces where the person felt relaxed and was able to forget that the camera existed.

Fig. 2-3: Heald, K. & Turnbull, B. (2007) Beth ["staged" sleep performance], Trans-Mongolian Railway, Beijing to Ulaanbaatar.

[41] Following The Pillow Series in Germany, 2007, I received an award to finance a self-initiated research trip to Mongolia, China and Japan. Titled The Dream Space, the research project involved 'staging' sleep performances in Asia with international collaborators. This fortuitous trip offered me the opportunity to continue my explorations into intimate spaces of sleep, sleeping in different locations and encountering other cultures.
[42] RoseLee Goldberg, Performance Art: From Futurism to the Present (London: Thames & Hudson, 1988).
[43] Beth, directed by Karen Heald & Beth Turnbull (China/Mongolia: Karen Heald, 2007), Video: SD.

Continuing The Dream Space in Japan, I explored what it was like to experience a state of "being in-between" whereby I slept in contrasting spaces, such as capsule hotels, which are places of mass consumerism and speed, and Buddhist temples which are spaces of reflection and ritual. This enabled the study to enter further into the discourse surrounding sleep performances, such as those previously cited alongside Sophie Calle's work which adopts a narrative approach with the bed as a central theme. Dreaming allows entrance into simultaneous time zones and my interest in the subject culminated in various films circulating at the time such as Pan's Labyrinth (Guillermo del Toro, 2006),[44] Babel (Alejandro González Iñárritu, 2006)[45] and "Wandafuru Raifu" (After Life)[46] by Hirokazu Kore-Eda (1998/2007). I related them to Akira Kurosawa's film Dreams (1990)[47] and Bill Viola's film Chott el-Djerid (A Portrait in Light and Heat) (1979).[48] These multi-narrative film dramas impacted my sense of time, and my relationship to travelling, whether physically or via the imagination through sleeping and dreaming.

The relationship between site and performance in Laurie Anderson's Institutional Dream Series (1972-1973)[49] and Tehching Hsieh's One Year Performance (1981-1982)[50] was created by the artists sleeping in various locations around New York. These "experiments" parodied empirical research methods as conducted by cognitive psychologists of that time, in an effort to interpret what transpires when we sleep. The artists merged these "invisible" performances with the environment to test the body's stamina and restrictions whilst obscuring its theatricality being outside of the art context. In contrast to Anderson's and Hsieh's performances, the art context in Drifting on a Pink Cloud[51] was made evident by the use of the small video equipment where the live and the recorded elements enabled random audience participation and framing of sleep and reverie within the work. The aspiration for the viewer was to create a dichotomy, producing juxtaposing emotions, whereby the sleeping vulnerable woman positioned in the beautiful landscape created a tension in the work.

John Cage (1970)[52] and Neil Mulholland (2009)[53] debate the use of sound within artists' performances and installations as an ambient source. Sounds, or the lack of them, play a significant role within the "dream films" which are frequently silent or incorporate ambient noises such as sounds found within the environment. Occasionally the "dream films" amalgamate vocals and noises created in collaboration with singers and musicians. In The Last Stop (Heald & Kearney, 2007)[54] the notion of the lullaby was used to mirror the complexity of the chora (Fig 2-4).

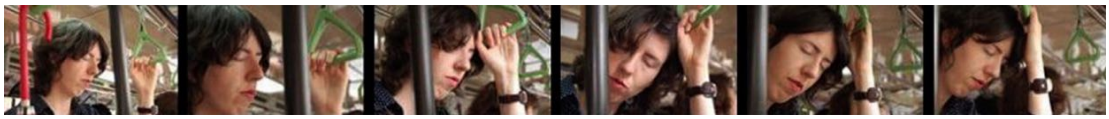

Fig 2-4: Heald, K. & Kearney, R. (2007*) The Last Stop* [video performance]. Kyoto, Japan.

---

[44] Pan's Labyrinth, directed by Guillermo del Toro (Spain: Optimum Home Entertainment, 2006), DVD.
[45] Babel, directed by Alejandro González Iñárritu (2006; United States/Mexico/France: Paramount Pictures Home Entertainment, 2007), DVD.
[46] Wandafuru Raifu (After Life), directed by Hirokazu Kore-Eda (1998; Japan/UK: Soda Pictures Ltd. Home Entertainment, 2007). DVD.
[47] Dreams, directed by Akira Kurosawa (United States: Warner Bros. & Akira Kurosawa USA, 1990), Film: 35mm.
[48] Chott el-Djerid (A Portrait in Light and Heat), directed by Bill Viola (United States: Electronic Arts Intermix Home Entertainment, 1979). Videocassette (VHS).
[49] Anderson, Laurie. (1972-1973) "Institutional Dream Series." [online image]. Accessed August 28, 2012. <http://www.ntticc.or.jp/Archive/2005/THERECORDOFTHETIME/Works/index.html>
[50] Tehching Hsieh. (1981–1982) "One Year Performance." Sean Kelly Gallery/Museum of Modern Art, January 21 – May 18, 2009. Accessed August 28, 2012. <http://www.skny.com/artists/tehching-hsieh/images/>
[51] Drifting on a Pink Cloud, directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney (Japan: Karen Heald, 2007), Video: SD.
[52] John Cage, Song Books Volume 1: Solos for Voice 3-58 (New York: Edition Peters, 1970).
[53] Neil Mulholland. (2009) "Dans l'air du Soir - Notes on Ambient Art," Public Art Scotland, March, 2009. Accessed September 20, 2011. <http://www.publicartscotland.com/features/9-Dans-l-air-du-Soir-Notes-on-Ambient-Art>
[54] The Last Stop, directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney (Japan: Karen Heald, 2007), Video: SD.

These diverse methods create sounds which, along with our dreams, pose a challenge to our rational model of the world as space and time are suspended. Dreams are often silent and this suspension occurs when engrossed in the films with ambient sounds often creating an interruption to the flow of time and space. This interruption within dreams not only occurs within the audience's feelings of ambient sounds but can also be experienced within the use of colour. This feature enables unexpected visual experiences in the moving image as portrayed in The Red Tories in Conversation with the Gold Shoes (Heald & Kearney, 2007),[55] which is similar to the sudden intrusion of colour in Shirin Neshat's film Zanan-e bedun-e mardan (Women Without Men), 2009, (Fig 2-5).[56]

Fig 2-5: Heald K. & Kearney, R. (2007) The Red Tories in Conversation with the Gold Shoes, [filmed performance]. Kyoto, Japan.

Continuing from The Dream Space, I had an opportunity to participate in the Dream Director (Luke Jerram, 2009)[57] at Compton Verney art gallery and question how a location changes the context for the audience. Jerram attempted to offer a new tool for sleep, science and clinical applications and raised questions about the rules of interaction and the boundaries of science and art. Using a range of diverse methods before and after The Dream Director I have tested the sleep performances which are an attempt to capture "women's time," the female body and the unconscious through audience reactions to the "dream films." For example in 2013, Bird-Jones and I stayed overnight in a Bed & Breakfast (B&B) in Wales and the resulting installation involved The Pillow Series IV (Bird-Jones & Heald, 2013)[58] being exhibited in Oriel Davies Gallery but this time existing inside two glass pillows and presented as a diptych (Fig. 2-6).

Fig. 2-6: Bird-Jones, C. & Heald, K. (2013) The Pillow Series IV [video installation & detail]. Oriel Davies Gallery, Newtown, Wales.

[55] The Red Tories in Conversation with the Gold Shoes, directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney (Japan: Karen Heald, 2007), Video: SD.
[56] Zanan-e bedun-e mardan (Women Without Men), directed by Shirin Neshat and Shoja Azari (UK: Artificial Eye, 2009). Film: 35mm.
[57] Luke Jerram, The Dream Director, installation, 2009, Compton Verney art gallery, Warwick, Warwickshire.
[58] Chris Bird-Jones & Karen Heald The Pillow Series IV, video installation, 2013*,* Oriel Davies Gallery, Newtown, Wales.

My intention is not to resolve or affirm any particular position or didactic as I operate between art, science and academia but to embed creative and empirical processes side by side to enable an understanding of a metaphysical sense of time. In doing so, I have discussed sleep as metaphor, as experienced dreams and as conversations around the vulnerability of the female body whilst sleeping. The artwork itself has explored narratives from complex timelines to investigate preverbal sounds and the sounds of the unconscious to explore cultural language and the resonances of sleep and time. Throughout the research I have created "dream films" to produce ambient environments, hoping to retain the audience at the threshold of the "unconscious thetic."

References

The Artists' Creation, Directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett. Wales: Karen Heald, 2009, Video: HD.

Babel, Directed by Alejandro González Iñárritu. 2006; United States/Mexico/France: Paramount Pictures. Home Entertainment, 2007, DVD.

Baring, Anne and Jules Cashford. The Myth of the Goddess (London: Penguin Books, 1993). 309.

Beth, Directed by Karen Heald & Beth Turnbull. China/Mongolia: Karen Heald, 2007, Video: SD.

Black Swan, Directed by Darren Aronofsky. United States: Fox Searchlight Pictures. Home Entertainment, 2011, DVD.

Butler, Alison. "Motor-driven metaphysics: movement, time and action in the films of Maya Deren." Screen 48 (2007): 1-23.

Cage, John. Song Books Volume 1: Solos for Voice 3-58. New York: Edition Peters, 1970.

Carter, Angela. The Fairy Tales of Charles Perrault. London: Penguin, 2008.

Chott el-Djerid (A Portrait in Light and Heat), Directed by Bill Viola. United States: Electronic Arts Intermix. Home Entertainment, 1979. Videocassette (VHS).

Co-Motion: Tales of Breastfeeding Woman, Directed by Zeinabu Irene Davis. 2010; United States, UCLA Film and Television Archive. Film: 16mm.

Diapason, Directed by Karen Heald. UK: Karen Heald, 2013, Video: HD.

Dijkstra, Bram. Idols of Perversity: Fantasies of Feminine Evil in Fin-de-Siècle Culture. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Dreams, Directed by Akira Kurosawa. United States: Warner Bros. & Akira Kurosawa USA, 1990, Film: 35mm.

Drift, Directed by Karen Heald. Belgium: Karen Heald, 2004-2005, Video: SD.

Drifting on a Pink Cloud, Directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney. Japan: Karen Heald, 2007. Video: SD.

The Fourth Dimension, Directed by Trinh T. Minh-ha & Jean-Paul Bourdier. Japan: Women Make Movies. Home Entertainment, 2001. DVD.

Foster, Gwendolyn A. Women Filmmakers of the African & Asian Diaspora: Decolonizing the Gaze, Locating Subjectivity. Illinois: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997.

Gregory, Richard L. The Oxford Companion To The Mind. USA: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Goffman, Erving. The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life. New York: Doubleday, 1956.

Goldberg, RoseLee. Performance Art: From Futurism to the Present. London: Thames & Hudson, 1988.

Heald, Karen. "'Dream Films" and Research as Collaborative Practice through Contemporary Art and Science Methodologies." PhD thesis, Leeds: Leeds Metropolitan University, 2014.

Heald, Karen and Jenny Hislop. "Intimate Space: Sleep, Art and Sociology" (paper presented at the annual meeting for the European Sociological Association (ESA) Research Network, Luneburg, Germany, March 28 – April 1, 2007).

hooks, bell. Black Looks: Race and Representation. Boston: South End Press, 1992.

The Hours, Directed by Stephen Daldry. United States: Paramount Pictures and Miramax

Films. Home Entertainment, 2003. DVD.
Humm, Maggie. The Dictionary of Feminist Theory. Hemel Hempstead: Prentice Hall/ Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1995. 173.
Jerram, Luke. The Dream Director, installation, 2009, Compton Verney art gallery, Warwick, Warwickshire.
Jung, Carl G. The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious. Translated from the German by R.F.C. Hull. London: Routledge, 1954.
Kirby, Kathy M. "Thinking through the Boundary: The Politics of Location, Subjects, and Space." Boundary, 1993, no. 2: 173-189.
Kristeva, Julia. Black Sun: Depression and Melancholia. Translated from the French by Leon. S. Roudiez. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.
Kristeva, Julia. Desire in Language: A Semiotic Approach to Literature and Art. Translated from the French by Tom Gora and Alice Jardine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1980.
Kristeva, Julia. Melanie Klein. Translated from the French by Ross Guberman. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
Kristeva, Julia. Revolution in Poetic Language. Translated from the French by Margaret Waller. New York: Columbia University Press, 1974/1984.
Kristeva, Julia. "Women's Time", in New Maladies of the Soul. Translated from the French by Ross Guberman. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.
The Last Stop, Directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney. Japan: Karen Heald, 2007, Video: SD.
Laurie Anderson. (1972-1973) "Institutional Dream Series." [online image]. Accessed August 28, 2012.
<http://www.ntticc.or.jp/Archive/2005/THERECORDOFTHETIME/Works/index.html>
Lechte, John. Fifty Key Contemporary Thinkers: from Structuralism to Postmodernity. London: Routledge, 1994.
Mac Giolla Léith, Caoimhin, "Damage and Survival." in Cecily Brennan: Selected Works 1999-2007, edited by Cecily Brennan. Skibbereen: West Cork Arts Centre, 2007.
Meshes of the Afternoon, Directed by Maya Deren & Alexander Hamid. 1943; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre, Boston University, Film: 16mm.
MacKinnon-Day, Patricia, Enclosure, Naked Spaces, installation, 2001, Oriel Davies Gallery, Newtown, Powys.
Melancholia, Directed by Cecily Brennan. 2005; Ireland: Cecily Brennan. DVD.
Metz, Christian. The Imaginary Signifier: Psychoanalysis and the Cinema. Indiana: Indiana University Press, 1982.
Neil Mulholland, "Dans l'air du Soir - Notes on Ambient Art," Public Art Scotland, March, 2009, http://www.publicartscotland.com/features/9-Dans-l-air-du-Soir-Notes-on-Ambient-Art (accessed September 20, 2011).
Mulvey, Laura. Death 24x a Second: Stillness and the Moving Image. London: Reaktion Books, 2006.
Mulvey, Laura. "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema." Screen 16 (1975): 6-18.
Neshat Shirin, "Men Without Women / Zanan-e bedun-e mardan," IMBb, 2001, http://www.imdb.com/title/tt1498887/?ref_=nm_ov_bio_lk1 (accessed November 18, 2011).
Nikolchina, Miglena. Matricide in Language: Writing Theory in Kristeva and Woolf. New York: Other Press, 2004.
Not still at home: equilibrium, Directed by Karen Heald & Caroline Sabin. Wales: Karen Heald, 2010, Video: HD.
Not still at home: poise, Directed by Karen Heald & Caroline Sabin. Wales: Karen Heald, 2010, Video: HD.
Pan's Labyrinth, Directed by Guillermo del Toro. Spain: Optimum. Home Entertainment, 2006, DVD.

Paper Interior, Directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett. Wales: Karen Heald, 2013, Video: HD.
Parker, Cornelia & Swinton, Tilda, The Maybe, performance/installation, 2013, Museum of Modern Art, New York, USA.
Perkins Gilman, Charlotte. "The Yellow Wallpaper. A Story." The New England Magazine, 1892, no. 11: 5.
The Piano, Directed by Jane Campion. 1993; Australia: Cibey 2000. Home Entertainment, 1997, DVD.
Plato. Timaeus and Critias. Translated from the Latin by Desmond Lee and Thomas Kjeller Johansen. London: Penguin Classics, 2008.
pra II, Directed by Karen Heald. Czech Republic/UK: Karen Heald. 2005, Video: SD.
The Red Tories in Conversation with the Gold Shoes, Directed by Karen Heald & Rachael Kearney. Japan: Karen Heald, 2007. Video: SD.
Rich, Adrienne. Notes Towards a Politics of Location in Blood, Bread and Poetry: Selected Prose 1979-85. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1984. 210-231.
Ritual in Transfigured Time, Directed by Maya Deren. 1946; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre, Boston University. Film:16mm.
Science.jrank.org, "Text/Textuality - Julia Kristeva: Textual Productivity And Intertextuality" Accesed June 30, 2014, http://science.jrank.org/pages/11415/Text-Textuality-Julia-Kristeva-Textual-Productivity-Intertextuality.html.
A Study in Choreography for the Camera, Directed by Maya Deren. 1945; United States: Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Centre, Boston University. Film: 16mm.
Tehching Hsieh, "One Year Performance," Sean Kelly Gallery/Museum of Modern Art, January 21 – May 18, 2009, http://www.skny.com/artists/tehching-hsieh/images/ (accessed August 28, 2012).
Unstrung, Directed by Cecily Brennan. 2007; Ireland: Cecily Brennan, DVD.
Wandafuru Raifu (After Life), Directed by Hirokazu Kore-Eda. 1998; Japan/UK: Soda Pictures Ltd. Home Entertainment, 2007. DVD.
Wellcome Collection. Sleeping and Dreaming, exhibition, 2007-2008, Wellcome Trust, London.
White, Directed by Karen Heald & Susan Liggett. Wales: Karen Heald. 2013, Video: HD.
Woolf, Virginia. Mrs Dalloway. London: Penguin Classics, 1926.
Zanan-e bedun-e mardan (Women Without Men), Directed by Shirin Neshat and Shoja Azari. UK, Artificial Eye, 2009. Film: 35mm.

View publication stats